

I arrived in Cameroon for a job with an NGO, but realized that I knew very little about this Central African country. I was curious. The African continent shows the scars of colonial history in the forms of foreign exploitation, wars, poverty, and environmental degradation. I wanted to take the time to live there in order to understand certain nuances in Cameroonian society. But the questions kept piling up, and my understanding only brought new doubts and questions. Still, I believe it is very important to take the time to think about the places I work while intimately experiencing them on a daily basis.
